CHAPTER EIGHTY
The reader's attention is drawn to the importance of the sentence "If I do nothing in the presence of Him and honors and accordance of this present world, I also do nothing in the presence of Christ."

Also consider: When I hear information from my old friend Richard and when was beginning the sentence for the second time, it was not fine of the reader to notice the sentence: "The reader who has not observed the marked departure in the sentence, Richardson is partially noticed in the same Richardson."

Oxford was found to have received a report from Robert Cecil, one of his whips and assistants, who had found the letter in the latter's pocket. His report did not mention the name, but when he showed it to the Duke of Buckingham, the latter, after a moment's reflection, said:

"Yes, that's right. He had found it."

The next line of adventures was significant.

The next day, the Duke of Buckingham and Lord Chandos, the Queen's friend and confidant, were both present at the Council meeting. The Queen, after some hesitation, decided to throw the letter to the wind.

"I am not sure what to do with this letter," she said. "It is not clear what it means, nor who wrote it."

Buckingham replied:

"I believe it is a threat. If the sender meant it to be taken seriously, he must have wanted to make sure that we knew about it."

The Queen, after some thought, decided to keep the letter and to send it to the Duke of York, who was in charge of the military forces.

"I think it is better to be safe than sorry," she said. "We must be prepared for any possibility."

The letter was sent and a copy was kept for future reference.

"This is a serious matter," the Duke of Buckingham said. "We must take it seriously."

The Queen nodded in agreement.

"I agree," she said. "We will deal with it as soon as possible."
